ISO 9001:2015

When we speak to our clients to go for ISO 9001 certification, we are being often asked by the business managers and leaderships that "Why does our company need ISO 9001 certificate?" Good question. ISO 9001 is the quality management system (QMS) standard and it has a number of benefits for any company willing to take that route. So, why should an organization need anyway a ISO 9001 certificate in the first place?

How will ISO 9001 benefit my small business?

ISO 9001 can be implemented by any business large or small and from any sector. In order to build and run a good business successfully, a sound foundation is the foremost requirement. ISO 9001 builds a good foundation for a small businesses that want to expand to new markets. ISO 9001 also helps to retain the existing customers along with the the jobs that has already been created through the business enterprise. By introducing a quality management system like ISO 9001 by a small business, the Quality of processes will be upgraded and costs due to inefficiency will decrease to a considerable extent. Besides, a small business will be able to advertise their use of the internationally recognized ISO 9001 to its existing and potential clients to gain competitive advantage in a market. This will create more new business opportunities for the enterprise that were not available before an objectively verified quality management system was in place. Having ISO international management system standards in place, such as ISO 9001 will also facilitate selling a business to the customers. The integrity and value of a small and large business will be apparent with well-documented processes and proof of quality. ISO 9001 will ensure and protect the reputation of your business under any situation.

GLOBAL ACCREDITATION FORUM (GAF)

Products are best able to meet the characteristic of Quality if they are produced in a controlled manner. Methods of control may vary enormously, typically from the skill of an artisan to the highly complex and technically advanced environment as may be encountered within a computer controlled and robot facilitated manufacturing factory.

There are Consumers who buy products from Manufacturers who are certificated by Certification Bodies who are accredited by Accreditation Authorities. It is questioned if sometimes the personnel operating in one level is quite ignorant of the needs of those operating at another. As is the way of the world, when there are common areas of interest, both personal and professional, there are formed associations and gatherings whereby mutual benefit may be gained. This is typical within industry and commerce and this has given rise to many trade associations, professional bodies, stakeholder groups and local and national government bodies. The raison d'être of these organisations is nearly always well meaning and public spirited but the achievement is not always so, and many organisations become introspective, self serving and potentially damaging to the interests they purport to uphold.

Such a situation is deemed to present a threat within the quality assurance profession where the interests of the profession are perceived to dominate, or even to exclude the interests of the general public. A significant indication of the self serving nature of these organisations is the elitist and exclusive nature of their membership. Often they exclude more than one representative of a group or particular demographic from membership. There are instances of constraints and controls being produced that far from advancing the position of the general public serve to maintain the position of the professional bodies that are generally self appointed to look after their interests.

This is deemed an unsatisfactory situation and it is to address this situation that Global Accreditation Forum (GAF) has been established.

One must recognise that although some organisations may have elements of unsatisfactory practice it does not necessarily follow that they are totally without worth or merit. In fact the greater part of these organisations is technically sound and well meaning and employs sound practice. Therefore it will be GAF practice to pick the best of the best practices and avoid the mediocre and the worst.
